Field of the Invention The invention pertains to the field of x-ray detection, and more specifically to the field of x-ray intensifier tubes. 2. Description of Related Art X-ray intensifier tubes convert low-energy x-rays to a higher-energy image-forming x-ray beam. The basic performance of an x-ray intensifier is first described in U.S. Pat. No. 2,465,330 issued to Ernest Dickmann in 1947. The existence of an intermediate excitation level between the x-rays and the visible light signal allows a phosphor to have a higher overall efficiency than otherwise possible. Many of the low-energy x-ray sources require the conversion of a small fraction of the x-rays to visible light to create an image. The use of ion-implanted phosphors in medical x-ray intensifiers was presented by Guy L. Hall in a paper entitled "Intensifying devices using ion-implanted scintillating materials", published in the paper "Medical Applications of X-ray Imaging", Phys. Med. Biol. 19, 1679-1687 (1974). Hall recognized the particular advantage of nitrogen-implanted aluminum, barium, or strontium. During the 1980's, the ion implantation of x-ray phosphors in microchannel plates was first proposed and later developed by the assignee of the present invention. The patent issued to its inventors, D. Land et al., is U.S. Pat. No. 4,741,201 (1988). When the x-rays, or the visible light beam, strike the phosphor, electrons from the phosphor release energy in the form of an electron-hole pair. The electrons from the excited electron-hole pair recombine quickly with the holes and tend to diffuse throughout the phosphor volume. Recent work by the inventors found that many phosphors such as alkaline earth sulfides have a relatively low sensitivity in the ultraviolet region of the spectrum. Such phosphors are described in U.S. Pat. Nos. 5,070,387 and 5,337,138. In one paper by G. Znosko et al., "On the absorption coefficient of an alkaline earth sulfide scintillator (BGO)" published in Nucl. Instrum. and Methods 208 1cb139a0ed
