I am trying to define an alias in my.zshrc file that will make it easy to add additional shell parameters to queries like so: alias: my-magic-command: ps -ef | grep This works, but the code above is ugly. I have seen definitions that do this like so: my-magic-command: "ps -ef | grep " I'm guessing that the reasons are: There is no ${} characters in the definition and it's implicitly expanded. The second definition is simpler, since there are no special characters like $ or pipe char involved. I'm curious if the bash engine would handle the above definition in the same way, and if that definition would be both simpler and less verbose. A: Neither of those definitions should work. Define like: alias my-magic-command='ps -ef | grep ' It should show up as: ps -ef | grep
